From The Editor's Desk

"One learns from books and example only that certain things can be done.

Actual learning requires that you do those things." –Frank Herbert

Curiosity and powerful learning is the base of all programs in our school and we want our students to be curious about their learning; ask questions to seek further understanding and develop an emotional intelligence to be lifelong learners. In Singhania, students get to play an active role in the classroom. They are asked to think critically, to learn how to construct, argue and evaluate evidence. They learn to work independently and to collaborate with one another. This leads to the accomplishment of a task thus contributing towards a successful outcome. They are encouraged to develop a positive outlook and become confident global citizens.
