

From the Editor's Desk -

"Always bear in mind that your resolution to succeed is more important than any other."

As we stand at the threshold of yet another brand NEW YEAR, many of us must be thinking about the changes we want to make in our lives.

New Year's resolutions are a 4,000 year old tradition. Despite centuries of practice around 80% of people still fail to keep their resolutions by February, and only 8% stick with them for the entire year. Those who defer from their goals usually are the ones who experience less of a need for willpower to resist temptation.

If we want to become the best version of ourselves, then we must set our goals and then firmly stick to them by tracking our achievements. Applaud yourself even on your small achievements.... This will keep you energized.

Steve Jobs once said, "People think focus means saying yes to the thing you've got to focus on.

But it also means saying NO to the hundreds of other ideas that distract us.

Dear Students, let's promise to work and achieve the best version of ourselves.

Wishing you all a very Happy Festive Season and a Successful year ahead !!!

“Morality is the basis of things and truth is the substance of all morality.”

Moral principles are crucial to the lives of any learner. They contribute to the development of positive character attributes including kindness, humility, respect, and compassion.

They can help pupils choose between good and bad or right and wrong. Additionally, it may finally encourage pupils to think critically and make objective decisions.

Long-term, instilling moral ideals in students serves as a moral compass that steers them away from peer pressure, social media, and society at large when they become teenagers and eventually adults.

Moral principles can give students a distinct viewpoint and aid in forming their attitudes and opinions about a variety of facets of life.

They might also assist in maintaining their optimism and enhancing their sense of self-worth.

Moral values can help pupils develop their attitudes and ideas about a range of aspects of life and provide them with a unique point of view. It is crucial that moral principles are instilled in children from an early age, starting at home. Early in a child's life, parents have the most influence on how they shape it.

Youngsters pick up morals from those around them. Thus, setting a good example for your children starts with you. Even though you may teach your child many values orally, they will only learn the ones you model with your actions.

Individual experiences are narratives, and children enjoy listening to stories.
